Complex documents are those that contain, as one or more components, media such as text, graphics, and the like. Examples of complex documents include the formats of the following familiar types of documents: posters, business cards, brochures, preprints, booklets, reports, presentations, post-it notes, and the like. Each of these documents, and others like them, may be created using a computer. However, the characteristics of documents intended for network distribution make it more difficult to share and edit them. One important such characteristic is the number of embedded objects, such as graphics, that make up the document. A typical networked environment is a multiple server network having a central server that manages a library of documents. These documents are stored in a common database that may be searched by users of the network. One difficulty with this approach is that for documents that are part of a complex document, a user may need to view the embedded objects that make up the complex document in order to identify which part of the complex document they want to access. The documents are often complex due to the number of objects embedded within the document, the fact that the objects are typically embedded with a significant amount of "side information," and the fact that some documents are highly formatted, making them difficult to display in a clear manner. The present invention addresses these and other problems associated with the prior art. These are the comments I received from Dr. 82157476af
